Latest video presents an opportunity to make long overdue changes

The recent release of bodycam footage from the Sterling Brown tasing and arrest is yet another example of the opportunity and need for a paradigm shift in how police engage with the community.

While the footage was disturbing and represented an excessive police response to an admittedly minor situation, this is just one incident that was captured on film.

This is an issue that is not unique to Milwaukee but a national crisis that must be addressed systemically.

The focus has to be placed on the culture and systematically enforced behavior that currently exists and must change. No human being should ever have to fear for their lives or safety while interacting with the public servants that are charged to protect and serve them.

Ultimately, Milwaukee has all the ingredients to be a great city, but each time a incident like this occurs we are reminded of how much work we still have to do.

We have introduced a file to discuss and evaluate the current police policy and training as it relates to de-escalation, along with implicit and cultural bias. We are prepared to work with the Community, Fire & Police Commission and MPD toward desired change.
